Built in the character of the Courthouse, these buildings are superb examples of the adaption of a Greek Temple to the needs of the day and reflect most truly the early nineteenth century enthusiasm for classical arohitecture. Whether it was lack of knowledge or of material, something that was not Greek, but was full of charm, was developed and we regret that the whole square was not oarried out in the temper of these two small buildings. What can be more simple than a small oblong room with conventional doors and windows and a portioo of four Greek Doric oolumns of plastered brick, white washed - a cornice of wood with a few mouldings and a gray shingle roof?
